WHAT IS 'TRADITIONAL ART'?

A.M.E. Bale's intention was that her scholarship would encourage, support and advance artists pursuing 'traditional' art – but what did she consider 'traditional' art?

THE STYLE AND TRAINING OF TRADITIONAL ART

One of A.M.E. Bale's colleagues, Sir William Dargie CBE, believed that this was easily defined by the traditional art training Miss Bale received at the National Gallery of Victoria Art Schools. This type of training had a long history and originated in Italy in the early 15th Century when artists, rather than working alone, worked in groups. During this time of High Renaissance, a successful painter might have set up a workshop staffed by a number of assistants to enable them to carry out and complete sometimes grandiose commissions. Artists of the time included Masaccio, Donatello, Piero della Francesca, Raphael and Michelangelo.

Sir William explains the origins, 'When a junior apprentice first entered the studio at the age of twelve or so, the first part of their training was to work on drawing antique models which had formed the master's own style. Having become proficient in drawing, the youth would be put to the task of scaling up the master's designs and sketches.'

'The next step would be to train in painting still-life followed by heads, hands, and even whole figures, as a prelude to becoming a fully trained craftsman and assistant to the master.'

By that time the artist would have reached adulthood and acquired a sound knowledge of human and animal anatomy, perspective and geometry. The fully trained artist would now have a choice between remaining as a senior employee or partner in the workshop where he began as an apprentice, or moving on to later set up their own studio.

It was this course of study, moving from basic drawing which progressed to full figures, that was taught in every European art school for five centuries. It was also the style taught at the National Gallery of Victoria Art Schools where Miss Bale attended and formed the vision for her Art Prize.
